French start-up Radioline launches new version of its internet radio service

Paris: (December 9, 2013)

Following the acquisition of Orange Liveradio this year, Radioline, Europe's leading internet radio provider, announces the release of its next generation service now available on smartphones, tablets and on the web.

Radioline, a French based start-up, gives listeners access to tens of thousands of radio stations and podcasts from 130 countries. Radioline also offers radio listeners an enriched user experience by integrating radio station program guide and music track information.

"This new version of Radioline allows our listeners to access their favourite shows and radio stations, and discover new ones, depending on their current mood or musical taste," said Geoffroy Robin, Radioline's COO.

Mr Robin said Radioline was already working on the next version that will include a more personalized and social user experience.

"Internet radio offers an exciting new radio experience. We want to become the number one radio companion for people looking for reliable and innovative radio services," he said.

Radio has been the number one mass media for the last century and its evolution online is growing with extraordinary momentum as users increasingly listen to radio on connected devices. More than 50% of online Americans listen to Internet radio (Edison Research 2013) at home, at work, during their commute or in their car.

The new service is available now on computers, tablets and smartphones.

About Radioline

Founded in 2012 by two serial entrepreneurs, Thomas Serval and Matthieu Delporte, Radioline (www.radioline.co) is a digital radio service, designed as a live mobile internet radio solution built on a highly-scalable, socially interactive cloud-based technology platform. It enables high-fidelity content streaming, massive channel aggregation, intelligent recommendation, advanced management, and universal access via any mobile device, online PC or connected TVs.
